

FOR A TOP BUSINESS CAREER

THESE days, many graduates are unemployed. The reason is that many of these graduates are just taught and not properly trained.

You should participate in practical courses that provide you with a complete education and training experience.

A degree or professional diploma is just a piece of paper that gets you a job interview but employers always look for those who have a good command of English (the most widely spoken business language), social, communication, creativity and problem solving skills as well.

Many individuals have secured great positions upon course completion at the Institute of Professional Managers & Administrators UK (IPMA UK), including a private secretary of a Japanese company who pursued the institute's Diploma in Business Administration. Upon completion, she got promoted to an executive position.

She went on to study an Advanced Diploma in Business Administration and with that she moved on to a large public listed company as a marketing manager. She later pursued a graduate diploma and MBA and eventually became a general manager of a group of companies with a lucrative pay package.

Another successful participant was a SPM school leaver who did business administration courses, starting from certificate, diploma, advanced diploma and then moved on to getting an MBA and even a PhD on a work-and-study basis. His last appointment was a general manager of a British university centre based in Malaysia.

Those who have studied courses at IPMA UK include senior politicians, government officers, entrepreneurs, executives and school leavers, all of whom said that their learning experience with the centre had been most rewarding.

At IPMA UK, proven practitioners such as mentors share their current and practical commercial skills and knowledge with students. They are assessed through coursework – case studies, quizzes, in-class tests, assignments and projects.

With these valuable skills, you would be able to solve many real life business problems and impress interviewers which could lead you to the job of your dreams. And in due time, you could even be on your way to be an entrepreneur!

Course fees are comparatively lower. And because IPMA UK does not have school holidays, the course durations are shorter.

Through IPMA UK's business networking, many young students have found good paying jobs, while pursuing their studies at the same time. This way, many of them do not require further parental financial assistance, which would be a wonderful achievement that all parents would be proud of.

IPMA UK's current portfolio of business administration courses are validated by an ISO accredited British professional examining body – The Institute of Professional Managers & Administrators UK.
